Understanding the graph  $G(k)$

Suppose we have a graph  $G$ , with  $n$  vertices,  $m$  edges, and with the probability of existence of an edge is  $\frac{n^2}{2m}$  I am wondering if there are any graph  $G$  for which

---

$$E(G) = \left(\frac{n}{\log n}\right)^{1/2}?$$

This is to understand the limiting behavior of the diameter in a sparse graph. My intuition is that since  $E(G)$  is random, it should be the case that a typical graph  $G$  should satisfy this equation. I am asking this because if we take  $k$  vertices and draw the largest component of size  $\frac{n}{2k}$ , it will satisfy the equation, which in turn implies that the diameter of the largest component is  $\frac{\log n}{2}$ , and in a typical graph the diameter is

---

$\frac{\log n}{2}$ . A: Let  $k \leq n/2$  be a constant, and let  $G$  be a  $k$ -regular graph on  $n$  vertices. It's not hard to prove that for any vertex  $v$  of degree  $k$  we have  $|\Gamma_G(v)| \sim k \cdot \frac{n-k}{k} \cdot \log(n-k)$ . This means that  $\Gamma_G(v)$  contains a clique of size  $k \cdot \log(n-k)$ .
